I wholeheartedly give Emily Giffin's latest release, The Lies That Bind, five stars. I found this book to be a brilliant, well-developed story of post 9/11 love and loss and, quite simply, I couldn't put it down. As someone who hasn't read an entire book in over a year, this spoke volumes about the storytelling from start to finish.

A simple, straightforward lie is easier to maintain. For example, an elaborate lie might be, "I'm late because when I got onto I-70, it was so backed up that I had to reverse all the way down the entrance ramp and I ended up taking country roads instead." A simple version of that lie would be, "Traffic was pretty backed up on I-70."

"The Lie" is one of Hurley's best episodes as a character. Every action of his here is somehow related to something we know about him already, but at the same time there is new conviction in him, and a loss of innocence which is both tragic and refreshing. Hurley is still great comic relief, but now his character is more than just that.
